Jeff Colgan is Assistant Professor at American University’s School of International Service and is interested in the geopolitics of oil, the resource curse, international security, and international political economy. In his recent 2013 book, Petro-Aggression: When Oil Causes War, he presents a new theory of why oil is linked to international conflict: petrostates with revolutionary governments have a much higher propensity to instigate militarized conflict than other types of states. He has articles published or forthcoming in journals such as International Organization, World Politics, International Security, and Foreign Policy.
